Introduction

As college costs and student loan debt continue to rise precipitously, more people are wondering if college is worth it. Based on earnings alone, yes, it is. On average, workers with a bachelor's degree make 80 percent more than workers with no more than a high school diploma.¹ At the same time, the potential benefits, as well as the costs, vary notably by institution, program, and field of study, and students should be informed about the potential costs and benefits of their choices.²

It is difficult to talk about the return on investment (ROI) of college in the same terms as other financial investments.³ Investing in a college education has greater immediate effects on a person's life than investing in the stock market; however, a college degree provides no tangible asset, unlike investing in a home.⁴ It may take years for the investment to pay off, since the value of the degree lies in what a person does with it.⁵ Investing in college entails some risk: most students go into debt to pay for college.

However, while much has been written about student debt, not all debt is bad. Some colleges with high average student debt also have high graduation rates leading to high earnings. Students who stay in school for four years (or longer) will logically accumulate more debt than students who stay a year and then drop out. College also has non-monetary benefits. A college credential is often essential for starting or changing a career. Once enrolled, college students might discover a new career field that changes their goals and opens their future, or they might make friends who later help their careers or increase their quality of life. The emotional and financial aspects of deciding whether and where to attend college makes it a hard decision to parse using the same factors as other investment choices.

College is expensive, and as with all expensive investments, the potential return is a key consideration when choosing where to enroll and what to study. Potential students should consider how much it will cost to obtain a credential, and how much they could potentially earn with it. They should also consider the time required to get the degree, the net price, the convenience and location of the program, the likelihood that they will graduate, and the amount of time needed to get traction in a career and to reach prime earning age.⁶ In addition, they should consider the net present value (NPV)⁷ of their potential future earnings, weighing the costs of investing in college now against the potential gains over time.

This report provides information about some of these factors by ranking colleges according to return on investment, using new data from the

1 Carnevale et al., The College Payoff, 2011.

2 This point is also made by Oreopoulos and Petronijevic, "Making College Worth It," 2013, and Webber, "Are College Costs Worth It?," 2016.

3 Other researchers have looked at measuring the financial returns from colleges, including Avery and Turner, "Student Loans," 2012, and Barrow and Malamud, "Is College a Worthwhile Investment?," 2015.

4 This comparison assumes that the risk of the investment in the stock market is the same as the risk of investing in college so that higher expected returns from the stock market are not a compensation for additional risk. See for example Greenstone and Looney, "Where Is the Best Place to Invest $102,000 – in Stocks, Bonds, or a College Degree?," 2011.

5 Baum and Schwartz (2012) make the case that investing in college is similar to making an investment that has to be paid for over time, such as buying a home. They frame the affordability of college not in terms of its total cost but whether the benefits from higher earnings can support the debt payments with enough resources left over for other necessities.

6 We do not deduct the opportunity costs of investment in a credential because the foregone earnings vary according to individual circumstances. For a more extended discussion, see Appendix A.

7 Appendix A includes a more detailed description of the data and methodology used in our net present value computations. Other studies of the ROI of a college credential also use net present value as their standard metric. See Webber, "Are College Costs Worth It?," 2016; Strohush and Wanner, "College Degree for Everyone?," 2015; and Lobo and Burke-Smalley, "An Empirical Investigation of the Value of a College Degree," 2018.

expanded College Scorecard, an online database started in 2015 to give more information about colleges.⁸ This report focuses on net present value from college, which was calculated by assuming that earnings 10 years after first attending are a reasonable proxy for future earnings. We also assumed that the total investment is reflected in the total cost of college, which the College Scorecard provides as the average annual net price.⁹ Debt calculations and values are included in some of our tables because student debt has become a focus of public attention.¹⁰

Not everyone who receives a degree earns the median for all people with that credential. Nor does every student end up with the median debt. But knowing what you could earn and what it will cost you is critical to making a good decision about whether and where to enroll. For each college, we evaluated such factors as net price, median debt, and median earnings, and their related ratios. This analysis is expansive: it ranks more than 4,500 public, private nonprofit, and private for-profit colleges that offer bachelor's degrees, associate's degrees, or certificates.¹¹

Our key findings illustrate how much college rankings can vary depending on the metric being used.

Community colleges and many certificate programs have the highest ROI in the short term. In the short term (10 years), community colleges, other two-year institutions, and many certificate programs have the highest return on investment because they generate strong earnings quickly after students finish their credentials. Certificates in nursing are particularly valuable in the short term. For example, a certificate from Veeb Nassau County School of Practical Nursing in New York ranks fourth in terms of net present value at the 10-year mark.

Colleges that primarily award bachelor's degrees have the highest ROI in the long term. In the long term (40 years), the highest returns generally come from colleges that primarily award bachelor's degrees. These degrees produce lower returns in the short term because they take longer to earn and require students to take on more debt. However, they also produce higher earnings, so returns on investment in these institutions will eventually overtake returns from most two-year awards. For example, Stevens Institute of Technology, in New Jersey, ranks number 579 in terms of 10-year net present value, but number 15 at a 40-year horizon. The highest long-term returns generally are at four-year colleges with low median debt levels and degrees leading to high-paying careers, including high-prestige universities like Harvard University and specialized institutions such as Maine Maritime Academy.

Public colleges have higher ROI than private colleges in the short term. Public colleges, mostly community colleges, have better returns on investment at short-term horizons (10 years) than private colleges, particularly for-profit colleges. Tuition is simply lower at public colleges, and they therefore require 8 The US Department of Education has implemented a series of initiatives in recent years to inform students about colleges to help them make better choices. The pendulum has swung from introducing consumer-information tools, such as the College Navigator, which has gotten little public attention, to taking regulatory gainful employment actions, which were intended to penalize colleges that saddled students with large debts while awarding low-value degrees. These regulations have been since rescinded. Now the mood has swung back toward the use of informational transparency about colleges as the department continues to update the College Scorecard with data on earnings and debt by program and institution.

9 The College Scorecard derives the average net price from the total cost of attendance; the average net price in the College Scorecard is not the same as the net price presented in the College Navigator. We assume that the average net price is a reasonable proxy for amounts required to be continually invested over the course of a student's enrollment. We do not consider the foregone earnings associated with obtaining a credential.

10 We include metrics using both total cost of attendance and total debt because debt and cost are not always proportional.

11 The rankings exclude colleges that are "not classified" by predominant degree awarded. See Appendix A for a more detailed definition of "predominant degree." We excluded institutions that did not report data for earnings and net price.

What is net present value?

Net present value can be summed up with the idiom “a bird in hand is worth two in the bush.” We tend to place more value on what we possess now than on what we might attain in the future if we take a risk. Economists evaluating savings and investing behavior try to account for this phenomenon by calculating the time value of money: they apply a discount rate to expected future cash flows to represent the idea that we value future money less than money we have today. The further into the future the projected cash flow, the more its value is discounted. Net present value provides an estimate of how future earnings are valued in the present.

Because the earnings from a college credential are often delayed for lengthy periods, this report uses net present value as a metric for evaluating the worth of a college credential. Many potential students considering a college education will weigh the costs of investing in college now against the potential gains over time from having a college credential.

For a more detailed explanation of net present value, see Appendix A.

less upfront investment and lower levels of debt. Short-term credential programs also take less time to complete (often no more than two years), so the financial rewards start accumulating more quickly. That is why 26 of the 30 institutions with the best 10-year net present value primarily grant either certificates or associate’s degrees. Ranked according to this metric, the list also includes technical high schools that offer college-level certificates, such as Greater Lowell Technical School in Massachusetts (number 2) and Eastern Center for Arts and Technology in Pennsylvania (number 9).

Degrees from private nonprofit colleges generally have a higher ROI in the long term than public universities. In the long run (40 years), a degree from a private nonprofit college is worth more on average than a degree from a public university. Students, on average, take out more than twice as much in loans to attend private colleges, but the median annual earnings 10 years after enrollment are almost $8,000 higher for graduates of private colleges than for graduates of public colleges. Over the course of 40 years, even after paying off higher amounts of debt, a private college graduate will reap a long-term net economic gain of $838,000, compared to $765,000 for graduates of public colleges. For example, the median debt for Babson College (private) is $25,000, while the median debt at the United States Merchant Marine Academy (public) is $6,500. Lifetime earnings for graduates of Babson College eventually overtake those of graduates of the United States Merchant Marine Academy because the difference in earnings 10 years after enrollment is $8,000 ($96,100 versus $88,100, respectively).

Calculating the Potential ROI of College

Earnings gains from postsecondary investments differ, but the time spent earning a credential affects when those earnings begin to accrue. Obtaining a postsecondary credential can take less than one year or be extended to five or six years or more, depending on the kind of investment a student wants to make. Differences in credential type (certificate or degree), focus (general versus specific), and time to completion all can affect both the magnitude and time horizon of potential earnings. Even without taking into account the full scope of possible value, our findings buttress the idea that college is a worthwhile investment. Moreover, we take the position that college should be seen as a long-term investment. The median net present value for all colleges is $723,000 in the long term (40 years after enrollment), but only $107,000 in the short term (10 years after enrollment).

When earnings begin to accrue matters because people tend to value future earnings less than earnings today—a concept generally referred to as the time value of money. This reflects the tradeoff that someone is willing to make in the future in order to have the money today. For example, someone might prefer to have $80 today versus $100 next year. This represents a discount or interest rate of 25 percent.

Earnings further into the future are worth less because they are discounted more than those in the near future.¹² The discounted sum of all future earnings minus the total amount invested over time (also discounted) is the net present value.¹³

To account for investment returns across different time horizons, this report attempts to measure the net present value of attending specific institutions.¹⁴ The College Scorecard reports earnings 10 years after 12 The interest rate at which future cash flows are discounted is usually linked to the alternative returns that a person could have earned if the money had been used for other investments. We use the yield of a safe investment such as US Treasury securities, which have a long-term return of approximately 2 percent. Future cash flows discounted at a higher rate are worth less than those discounted at a lower rate. Other researchers have used different rates, such as the average historical returns to the stock market. Avery and Turner (2012) use 3 percent, while other studies use discount rates of 5 percent or higher. For a review, see Barrow and Malamud, "Is College a Worthwhile Investment?," 2015. See Appendix A for further discussion.

13 Related to the net present value is the internal rate of return, the interest rate that makes the total investment equal to the positive earnings. We calculated the internal rate of return but do not present it here because this rate of return cannot be used to consistently rank investments when the time to positive earnings or investment amounts vary.

14 See Appendix A for a more detailed explanation of our data and methodology.

students enter each institution, and those figures are used as the basis to project their earnings into the future.¹⁵ We assume no earnings increases after 10 years, so our estimates can be considered to be at the lower end of possible outcomes.¹⁶

When earnings begin to accrue matters because people tend to value future earnings less than earnings today—a concept generally referred to as the time value of money.

Looking at a 10-year horizon, a student considering an investment in a certificate (assuming completion in a year) would have positive earnings for nine years and incur an investment cost only in the first year. The same student considering an investment in a four-year degree (assuming graduation in five years) would incur costs for the first five years¹⁷ and positive earnings for the next five years.¹⁸ At a 40-year horizon, earnings flows from a certificate are considered to be positive for 39 years while for a bachelor's degree, earnings flows are positive for 35 years.¹⁹

We calculated the net present value at different time horizons associated with investing in postsecondary education for every college in the nation that primarily awards bachelor's degrees, associate's degrees, and certificates. More than 1,200 of these colleges are very small, with 250 students or less. These smaller colleges are included in this analysis because changes to federal policy that have been proposed to meet the needs of adult students would allow students in smaller and shorter programs to qualify for Pell Grants. For example, the JOBS Act of 2019 would allow students to receive Pell Grants for programs as short as eight weeks in duration.²⁰

15 Webber (2016) finds that depending on the choice of major and costs, the age at which the net present value of a bachelor's degree becomes positive can be as early as 31 years old for STEM majors and as late as 64 years old for arts and humanities majors.

16 We also assume no increases in the cost of postsecondary investment, including tuition. This assumption matters less at long horizons but would overestimate the economic value in the short term if costs are actually increasing.

17 Lobo and Burke-Smalley (2018) find that as the time to graduation increases, the net present value of a bachelor's degree falls. Their net present value calculations also deduct lifetime earnings of a high school graduate. For someone who graduates in six years, their net present value of lifetime earnings (up to age 70) is negative. For education majors, the net present value is negative if the student does not finish within four years.

18 We assume that costs are incurred for five years even for institutions with low graduation rates where the likelihood of dropping out before five years is higher. For institutions with low graduation rates, our estimates of negative cash flows most likely exceed actual costs and bias the net present value downward. Median earnings reported in the College Scorecard include completers and non-completers, so positive cash flows already incorporate the probability of not finishing. We did not attempt to match the graduation rate with the share of the earnings cohort that was not working.

19 For a 20-year-old who is considering alternatives, a 10-year horizon would represent the payoff when the student is 30 years old, while a 40-year horizon would represent the payoff when the student is 60 years old. The two time horizons therefore help answer the question, "Where should I expect to be when I am 30 (or 60)?" This may not be relevant for non-traditional students who may be returning to college at older ages.

20 Kreighbaum, "Brewing Battle Over Pell Grants," 2019.

Here are some of the most notable findings:

The colleges with the best long-term net economic gains are all four-year institutions. Eight of the 10 are private nonprofit institutions. The two public institutions are maritime academies: Maine Maritime Academy and the US Merchant Marine Academy. Degrees from six of the 10 institutions have a net present value of $2 million or more at the 40-year horizon. The following table highlights the variation in different metrics, and how value can change dramatically over time. Looking at a 10-year horizon, Babson College's net present value ranks number 304. At the 40 year horizon, however, Babson's net present value ranks in the top 10 (Table 1).

In the short term, eight institutions that primarily award certificates have the highest economic value. Of the top 10 colleges, only two are predominantly bachelor's degree-granting institutions. Both of those colleges, St. Louis College of Pharmacy and Albany College of Pharmacy and Health Sciences, also have the highest net present value rankings at the 40-year horizon. At the eight top certificate-awarding institutions, five of the programs with the highest economic value are related to nursing (Table 2).

A wide variety of institutions have low long-term economic value. The bottom 10 institutions range from theological institutions to beauty schools to colleges specializing in the arts. They are evenly divided between two- and four-year institutions. The short-term (10 year) net present value for all these institutions is less than $60,000. Two have a negative net present value (Table 3).

Institutions that offer primarily bachelor's degrees have the lowest short-term economic value but the highest long-term economic value. Colleges that offer primarily associate's degrees have the highest short-term economic value ($141,000) (Figure 1).

This is driven mostly by the fact that bachelor's degrees take longer to complete than certificates or associate's degrees. The median debt for a bachelor's degree is slightly less than twice that of the overall median of $9,800 and twice that of a certificate program, reflecting the length of time required for this investment (Figure 2). Short-term net present values favor shorter programs, but the median earnings of these programs are less than the 10-year median earnings of $37,500 for all workers.²¹

Private nonprofit colleges have an edge over public institutions.

At institutions that primarily award bachelor's degrees, the long-term net economic gains are $838,000 at private nonprofit colleges, compared to $765,000 at public colleges (Figure 3). Graduates of private nonprofit institutions have a sizable edge in earnings 10 years after enrollment (a median of $41,000 for students who went to private colleges vs. $33,000 for students who attended public institutions). Even though the median debt levels at public institutions ($7,000) are less than half those at private nonprofit institutions ($17,000), the higher earnings for students who attended private colleges are sufficient to drive the long-term gain in favor of private nonprofit institutions (Figure 4).

In addition to looking at the colleges with the most and the least long-term economic value, we also looked at colleges at several tiers of the overall rankings: colleges in the middle range of long-term net present value (50th percentile of net present value), at the cusp of the top quartile (75th percentile), and at the cusp of the bottom quartile (25th percentile).

Figure 3. In the long term, the net present value of future earnings for students who attend private nonprofit colleges is greater than that of earnings for students who attend public institutions.

The 50th percentile of the long-term net present value is evenly divided among colleges at all three degree levels. The 50th percentile of the long-term net present value is between $718,000 and $723,000. Of the 45 institutions at the 50th percentile, 19 predominantly award associate's degrees, 15 mostly award bachelor's degrees, and 11 primarily award certificates; 31 are public colleges and universities, nine are private nonprofit colleges, and five are private for-profit institutions (Table 4).

Institutions at the 75th percentile of long-term net present value are mostly bachelor's degree-granting institutions. For the 45 institutions in this group, the net present value at the 40-year horizon ranges from $867,000 to $877,000. Twenty-four of these colleges predominantly award bachelor's degrees, 13 predominantly award associate's degrees, and eight primarily award certificates; 22 are private nonprofit colleges, 20 are public, and three are private for-profit institutions (Table 5).

Conclusion

The College Scorecard is an ambitious attempt to provide copious data and information to students and families who are comparing colleges. The price of this abundance is a lack of guidance on how the data can be used to guide college investment decisions.

The combination of program costs and earnings into a simple calculation of returns is not sufficient to provide clarity about the value of degrees from various institutions, but it does provide some insights. While in our view, the net present value at a long-term horizon is the best comprehensive benchmark for judging value, students might take a different view depending on their goals and reasons for pursuing postsecondary education. Researchers continue to struggle to provide a set of clear guidelines for how the scorecard data can best be used. The expected addition later this year of median debt and earnings by program by institution might lead to greater clarity.

Appendix A. Data and Methodology

The data on debt is from the update to the College Scorecard released in May 2019.²² The College Scorecard includes more than 1,900 variables about some 7,000 postsecondary institutions in the United States and its territories.²³ In this analysis, we only include institutions that reported net price and median earnings at six, eight, and 10 years after initial attendance. These criteria might have caused us to exclude some small institutions where suppression of data to protect student privacy is more likely. We also excluded duplicate institutions, and institutions where the predominant degree is a graduate degree.²⁴ In addition, we excluded one institution with a negative net price on the assumption that some of the data must be in error.²⁵ Interpretations of our rankings should take such exclusions into account.

The College Scorecard categorizes colleges according to the highest level of award offered at each institution: four-year, two-year, or less-than-two-year. The predominant degree is the type of undergraduate award that the institution primarily confers, which may not constitute the majority of all degrees conferred by a college. For example, an institution that awards 40 percent bachelor's degrees, 30 percent associate's degrees, and 30 percent certificates would be classified as offering predominantly the bachelor's degree.

This report presents data for 4,529 institutions. Of these, 1,748 (39%) are public institutions, 1,530 (34%) are private for-profit institutions, and 1,251 (28%) are private nonprofit institutions.

The debt measure used is the median principal loan amount upon entering repayment for the debt cohort of each institution. This measure includes those who completed and those who withdrew. The debt data covers only part of the federal loan programs: direct subsidized federal loans, direct unsubsidized federal loans, and direct PLUS loans (excluding private loans and PLUS loans to parents of the students). The median debt in the sample used is $9,774.²⁶

The earnings measure is the median annual earnings of students in the institution's cohort who are working and not enrolled six, eight, and 10 years after entry into the institution. The median of the 10-year reported earnings in the sample used is $32,300.

Net Present Value: The Time Value of Money

The primary metric we use to rank colleges in this report is the net present value. We selected this metric in part because it takes into account the time value of money.

²⁴ Forty-one institutions in the College Scorecard listed graduate degrees as their predominant degree.

²⁵ This institution was Oconee Fall Line Technical College.

The present value is how much a sum of money over time is valued today. For example, if we were to receive $1,000 today, it would be worth $1,000 today. But what if we were promised $1,000 next year? How much would we be willing to discount next year's $1,000 in order to receive it today? If we are willing to accept $980 today instead of $1,000 next year, then the $980 is the discounted cash flow of next year's $1,000, representing the tradeoff that we are willing to make in order to receive the cash today. Over a long time horizon, the choice of discount rate can have large effects. Consider a stream of cash flows of $1,000 over a 30-year period: At a 2 percent interest rate, the net present value is $22,396. At a 5 percent interest rate, the net present value is $15,372. At a 10 percent interest rate, the net present value is $9,427.

The rate at which we are willing to discount next year's cash flow can be interpreted as an interest rate (r), as in

$$$980 = \frac{$1,000}{(1 + r)}$$

Solving for the discount rate, r is approximately 2 percent.

What if we were to receive the $1,000 two years from today? If we were to apply the same discount rate to the amount received two years from today, the discounted amount would be slightly more than $961:

$$\frac{$1,000}{(1 + 0.02)^2} = $961.17$$

Cash flows further into the future are discounted at higher rates. Therefore, the combined present value today of $1,000 next year and $1,000 two years from now is $1,941.55:

$$\frac{$1,000}{(1 + r)} + \frac{$1,000}{(1 + r)^2}$$

$$\frac{$1,000}{(1 + 0.02)} + \frac{$1,000}{(1 + 0.02)^2} = $980.39 + $961.17 = $1,941.55$$

Following this logic, we calculated net present value (NPV) using the following equation:

$$NPV = - \sum_{t=0}^{T_{PL}} \frac{Cost}{(1 + r)^t} + \sum_{t=T_{PL}+1}^{T_H} \frac{Earnings}{(1 + r)^t}$$

in which T_{PL} is the program length, T_H is the time horizon, and r is the interest rate for discounting (2%).²⁷ The interest rate at which future cash flows are discounted is usually linked to the alternative returns that a person could have earned if the money had been used for other investments. We make the assumption that the person is risk averse and will compare returns to the yield of a safe investment, such as US Treasury securities, which currently have a long-term return of approximately 2 percent. We use a 2 percent discount rate since we cannot assume that someone is willing to trade off the higher risk of investing in the stock market for a higher return. Other researchers have used different rates, such as the average historical returns to the stock market or an average of both the yield on US Treasury securities and stock market returns.²⁸ This implicitly assumes that someone is willing to accept a higher return in exchange for the additional risk of investing in the stock market.²⁹

Even though we rank the net present value for all colleges with available data, we exclude from these rankings an important benchmark: the alternative to not investing in postsecondary education. This benchmark varies depending on circumstances. For example, instead of attending college, a potential student might choose to participate in the labor force with just a high school diploma and earn $15,000 a year.³⁰ For another potential student, the alternative to not investing in postsecondary education might mean earning nothing or earning considerably less, especially in areas with high unemployment and few opportunities. Moreover, there are geographically specific earnings variations. For example, someone who lives in a rural setting and attends a rural community college would have different foregone earnings than someone in an urban setting. While we cannot account for all possible alternatives, it is important to note their existence and students should take this into consideration.³¹

Assumptions

In analyzing the College Scorecard data, we made the following assumptions:

Cost is based on each institution's reported net price. When an institution reports more than one net price (for example, when it reports a separate net price for its largest program or its largest program that does not follow a traditional program year), we computed a simple average of all the reported net prices.

Program length is based on the predominant undergraduate degree and, in the case of certificates, the level of the institution. This estimate favors institutions with high graduation rates and may overestimate the total cost for institutions with low graduation rates, at which students enrolled for shorter periods might incur lower costs. Our assumptions about program length are as follows:

Institutions predominantly awarding bachelor's degrees are assigned a program length of four years.

Institutions predominantly awarding associate's degrees are assigned a program length of two years.

Among institutions predominantly awarding certificates, those that are less-than-two-year institutions are assigned a program length of less than two years; those that are two-year institutions are assigned a program length of two years; and those that are four-year institutions are assigned a program length of four years.

Cash flows are discounted at an interest rate of 2 percent, using the following assumptions about program length:

If the program length is less than two years, we assume that the cash flow for the first year is negative—that is, in the first year, the

²⁹ The choice of discount rate can depend on the perspective of the analyst. For example, if an analyst was a policy maker interested in the costs and benefits of using loans to subsidize higher education, then a higher discount rate might be applicable. In this case, the analyst would consider the costs of administering the federal loan program instead of the individual net price of institutions. Analysts might also use a higher interest rate if they perceived that the cash flows are highly risky.

³⁰ This annual earnings amount is close to the federal minimum wage at $7.25 per hour for 2,000 hours per year. The 40-year net present value for this stream of earnings is $397,000, while at a 10-year horizon, the net present value is $130,000. At $10 per hour, the 10-year net present value is $180,000, while the 40-year net present value is $547,000. The interest rate used to discount future cash flows is 2 percent. Webber (2016) includes foregone earnings in his analysis.

student is paying for the costs of attending the institution and does not net positive earnings.³² We use reported net price to calculate the negative cash flow. We assume positive cash flow (based on median earnings) for subsequent periods.

If the program length is two years, we assume that the cash flow for year one through year three is negative—that is, the student attends the program for three years and pays the net price. We assume cash flows are positive (based on median earnings) for subsequent periods. The three-year assumption allows for delay in graduation.

If the program length is four years, we assume that the cash flow for year one through year five is negative—that is, the student attends the program for five years and pays the net price. We assume cash flows are positive (based on median earnings) for subsequent periods. The five-year assumption allows for delay in graduation.

Because median earnings reported in the College Scorecard include completers and non-completers, positive cash flows account for the probability of not finishing. It is possible to weight the negative cash flows (net price) by the graduation rate to reflect the likelihood that students remain enrolled in subsequent years, using the graduation rate as a proxy for the retention rate so that the net price applies only to the fraction who remain. We do not do this in this report. For high-cost institutions, this would increase the short- and medium-term NPV relative to our calculations.

Median earnings are based on median earnings reported at six, eight, and 10 years after entering each institution. We used these data, reported by the College Scorecard, as the basis for the following calculations:

To interpolate earnings in the seventh year, we calculate the change between years six and eight and divide by two.

To interpolate earnings in the ninth year, we calculate the change between years eight and 10 and divide by two.

We compute the average annual change by dividing the sum of the two changes calculated above by four.

We then use the average annual change to compute earnings for earlier years under the assumption that earnings in years two, three, four, and five are always lower than earnings in year six. Therefore, the earnings in the fifth year are equal to the earnings in the sixth year minus the average annual change; earnings in the fourth year are equal to the earnings in the fifth year minus the average change; and so forth. In cases where the average change is negative, we use the absolute value of the change. For example, if the change in average earnings between years six and 10 was -$1,000, we assume that year five earnings are $1,000 lower than year six earnings, that year four earnings are $2,000 lower than year six earnings, and so forth.

For projections with a horizon greater than 10 years, we assume no growth in median earnings after 10 years. Because earnings actually tend to grow with age and then plateau, and workers who hold bachelor's degrees experience faster earnings growth than those without a bachelor's degree, our estimates of net present value can be assumed to be at the lower end of possible estimates.

³² Short-term certificates can be less than one year. We made no additional assumptions regarding delays in getting a credential in this case because adding an additional year to what may be a six-month certificate might result in much higher than expected costs of attendance.

Earnings are assumed to be gross earnings. We do not subtract spending on necessities such as housing, food, and transportation. One approach to accounting for cost of living would be to assume that the amount spent on these items is a fixed proportion of earnings (e.g., 60%). Another would be to assume that it is some fixed amount based either on poverty thresholds or guidelines for an individual. We do not take either approach in this report.

Caveats

We present our findings with the following caveats:

Our rankings do not account for the following, which may affect stability over time:

- Cohort-specific effects: The current data include cohorts who entered postsecondary education just prior to the Great Recession.
- Location-specific effects: The data do not account for regional or state-specific economic booms and busts.
- Occupation-specific effects: Economic shocks to specific occupations would primarily affect special-focus institutions or short-term programs that specialize in certain occupations (e.g., cosmetology, truck driving, or welding).

- Industry-specific shocks: Economic shocks to specific industries could be geographically dispersed or localized, and they could disproportionately affect specific occupations. For example, shocks to the home-building industry could affect institutions specializing in design or drafting as well as those training students for the building trades.

In addition, the computations are based on assumptions that might not hold. To prevent the need for such assumptions, we recommended that future iterations of the College Scorecard include the following:

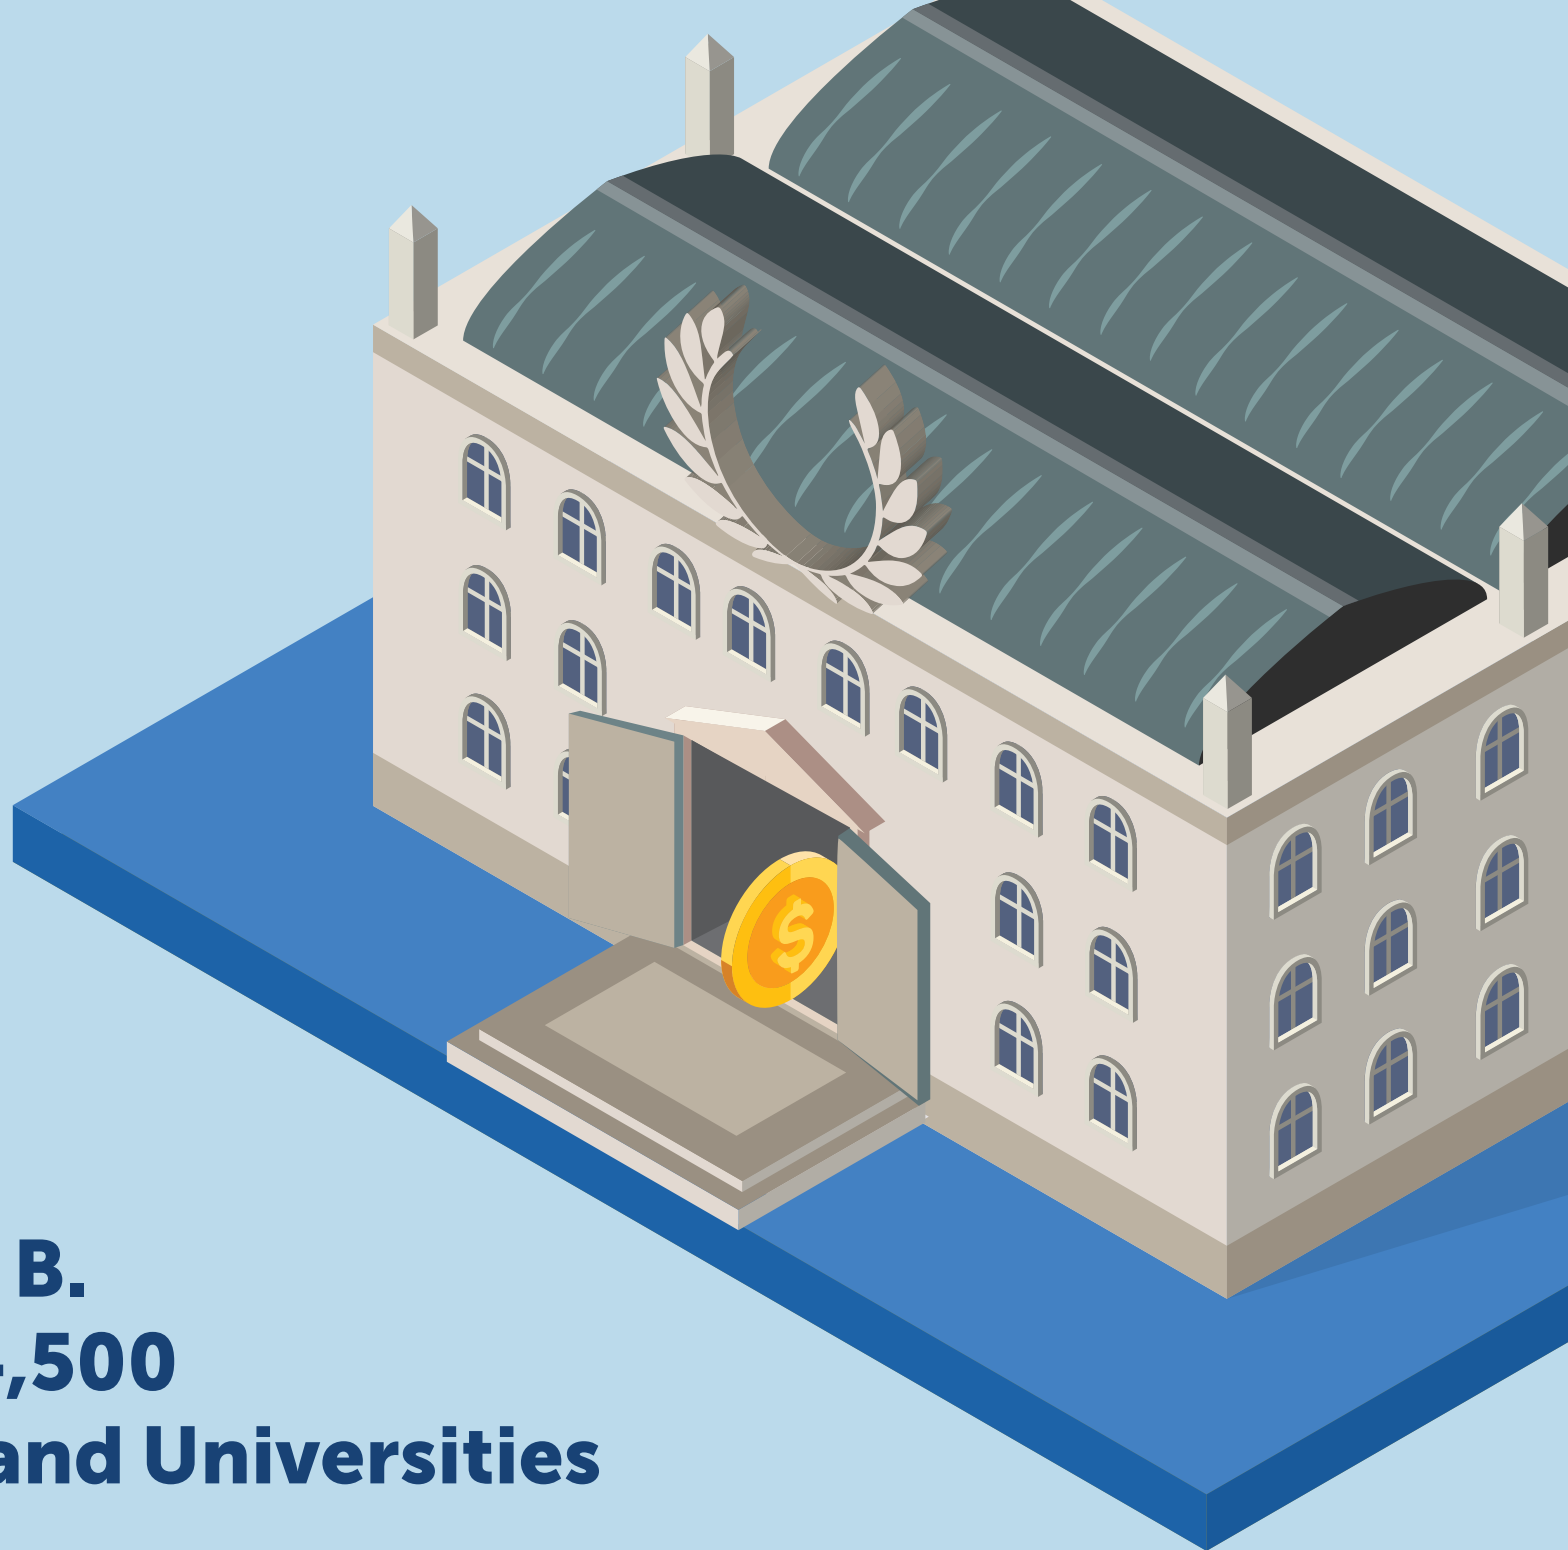

Data on earnings greater than 10 years, including median earnings at 15 and 20 years after enrollment;

Earnings at shorter intervals (including two, three, and four years after entering) for institutions primarily awarding less-than-four-year credentials; and Inflation rates or changes in average net price at the institutional level.
